NO FUSION.

Suggestions that the Democrats of Utah fuse with one wing of the Republican party have cropped out from time to time, apparently for the purpose of testing Democratic sentiment. It is hardly necessary to say there will be no fusion of any kind to which the Democrats are a party.

In the first place, the Democrats have no use for any faction which might want to fuse forces with them. They have preserved their identity and their principles through all the troublous times that have beset the state, and they have done this when their cause seemed almost hopeless. Now, when the demoralization of their foes is complete and victory is possible, they are determined to finish the fight as they began it, as they have maintained it, on principle alone.

In the second place, if the party leaders were foolish enough to consider a proposal for fusion they could not count on the support of the rank and file in such a movement. The average Democrat is an independent individual, and in Utah he is just a little more independent than anywhere else. He is opposed to the platform of the Republicans, to their system of party management and to their leaders as individuals and politicians. He wants no alliance with them and he will have none. To him defeat with honor is better than success with questionable methods.

No, there will be no Democratic fusion with anybody or any party this fall. The Democracy will name a good ticket, make a plain, straightforward declaration of principles, state unequivocally its opposition to the Republicans and "Americans" alike, and go into battle with a determination to win. There will be no faltering, no skulking, and the battle will be fought out on Democratic lines alone.

THE DEMOCRATIC TEXT-BOOK.

With the issuance of the Democratic campaign book this week the battle is fairly on. The synopsis of the publication indicates an aggressive fight by the Democracy, and states some trenchant facts for the consideration of the voter. Naturally, the trusts and the tariff are made the chief issues as collateral subjects; and the president's stand-at-titude on both is set forth at length. The president's appropriation of the Democratic platform on railroad legislation, his appeal to the Democrats of the senate for help, and his subsequent breach of faith with them and alliance with Aldrich are condemned and emphasized as evidence that even in this most important legislation, in a crisis where he had committed himself irrevocably, he abandoned his position and betrayed the men who had been asked to waive their party lines that he might secure what the people demanded.

Incidentally, the campaign book reviews the insurance scandals in New York with their complete confirmation of Judge Parker's charge that the Republican presidential campaign committee was the beneficiary of the trusts and great corporations—a charge which the president denied most vehemently with a show of injured innocence, and for which he has never apologized, as he should, to Judge Parker.

The attitude of the president and his administration toward organized labor, one of the important factors in this fall's campaign, is elaborated fully. Quotations from his writings and official proclamations are given to show that he has no sympathy with labor organizations, and that his administration has done its utmost to defeat the aims of labor.

Finally, the recital avers that the president has assumed to be bigger than the law, when it suited his purpose; that he has usurped the functions of the legislative and encroached upon the judicial department; that he has used his power in behalf of the asphalt trust in Venezuela and other big corporations in the Philippines, Porto Rico, Cuba and San Domingo. The "big stick" policy comes in for its share of attention also, and the presidential desire for a big naval and military establishment.

Altogether, the outline of the book given in the dispatches, gives promise of a red-hot campaign, one designed to put the Republicans on the defensive all along the line and wrest from them a large number of congressional seats, if it does not wipe out their majority in the lower house entirely.

THE "WOLVES" OF RUSSIA.

In a remarkable series of letters, a correspondent of the London Times is telling of Russian conditions in the interior, which explain much of the hitherto inexplicable brutality of the riots and wholesale murders perpetrated by the peasant revolutionists in retaliation for wrongs at the hands of administrative officials.

The most fiendishly ingenious punishment devised by officials is the condemnation of political offenders to the fate of the mythical Wandering Jew. This is accomplished by a sentence which compels the victim to travel continually under what the peasants call "The Wolf's Pass." The passport provides that the condemned shall be permitted to travel and work in places designated by the officials, but that no citizen shall give them shelter for more than one night, that they shall report to the police on their arrival wherever they may be, and that they shall be kept moving without opportunity for rest or for the accumulation of means.

Commenting on the results of this system, the correspondent says that these "wolves" are the missionaries of discontent who are stirring up the peasants of the interior to revolt. They bear in their persons evidence of an inconceivably cruel system, their words carry conviction as nothing else could, they reach a class that is ignorant, easily moved, unafraid of death or any other penalty that could be inflicted by the government, and the system is bearing fruit beyond all the hopes of the revolutionists.

After the recital of the Times, one wonders that the Russians have endured as long as they have the wrongs of an unrestrained irresponsible despotism. To separate a man from his home and family and friends, to send him wandering like a lost soul through strange and forbidding lands, to alienate him from his country and make him an outcast on the face of the earth, serves well to illuminate the system of maladministration which has given Russia her reign of terror. No government can long endure under such conditions; no human kind but would prefer death itself to this ultimate refinement of horror, the life of the "wolf."

WYOMING'S DEMOCRATIC PAPER.

Citizens of Wyoming, regardless of party, should welcome the Cheyenne Leader back into the Democratic fold. For a dozen years the Democracy of that state has been unrepresented at the capital by a newspaper. The need of a free, untrammelled newspaper there was never greater and could scarcely be greater than it now is. The government of the state is in the clutches of an arrogant, despotic ring that is just as harsh to independent Republicans—and, if report be true, even harsher—than it is to Democrats who are willing to wink at conditions. There is more than a chance to redeem Wyoming from the band of self-seeking "patriots" who control it, if the citizens of Wyoming are willing to do a little thinking. The new Leader should be a potent factor in the redemption of the state.

The Delphic Beverage, it will be recalled, is the same young man that journeyed through the Orient and wrote a big book telling how Russia would wipe Japan off the map. His annexation of Cuba, off hand, seems to have come from the same pipe.

If a stranger were sandbagged and robbed on the streets of Salt Lake, would the chief of police expect the newspapers to furnish all the evidence for the prosecution in case they printed the story of the victim?

Chief Sheets' members of the council remind one of those Republicans who insist the robber tariff ought to be revised by its friends; they think Sheets ought to be investigated by his political partners alone.

The "American" council has added another $15,000 to Pat Moran's conduit job. Couldn't we be permitted to know the worst at once? Or must we wait until after election for the next installment.

The McWhirters have lost their money, but they have learned a heap about police methods in Salt Lake. So has the public.

The little packers who failed to clean up are squealing like stuck pigs. The meat-eating public grunts with satisfaction.

It has been several days since the $10,000 bunco game was pulled off under police auspices, but Sheets is still chief.

With a council investigation in progress, there is a prospect of an immediate rise in quotations on whitewash.

Besides, 90 per cent seems to be rather a large proportion, even for a bunco man and bogus policeman.

Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., is in trouble. It seems to be hereditary.

These be the times that try men's galls.

The marriage ceremony was performed by Rev. William Roff Lloyd of the Central Christian church and was witnessed by the relatives and the close friends of the young people. The bride was attended by Mrs. Baysinger as matron of honor and Miss Emma Veller as maid. Frank E. Whitworth was the best man and little Bernice Hall the flower girl. As the guests assembled, Miss Katherine Thorpe sang "Beloved, 'Tis Morn," and later "O Promise Me," and as the hour for the nuptials arrived Miss Flora McCann played the Lohengrin wedding chorus. The bride was given away by her brother. Later the bridal party was assisted by Miss Carrie Sappington, Miss Hortense Hodgson and Eber W. Hall. In the dining room were Mrs. A. H. Cook, Mrs. Philip Schenert and Miss Blanche Cassidy. Punch was served by Miss Nellie Davis and Miss Nina Thorpe.

The bride's gown was of white French lawn with lace trimmings. Her veil of tulle was caught with flowers and she carried a cluster of white roses. The rest of the party were all in white and carried pink roses, and the little flower girl carried a basket from which she strewed the bride's pathway with roses. The bridal party stood in the bay window under a bower of pink and white flowers and ferns. In the dining room red dahlias were used and sweet peas.

Waters, Mrs. Louis Simons and Mrs. Bert Cohn.

Another wedding of yesterday was that of Miss Hattie W. Dwyer, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Ward, to H. J. Binc. The ceremony was performed by Rev. John R. Lloyd in the presence of friends, and a reception followed. The young people went direct to their own home. They will be at home after Oct. 15 at 673 Marcel avenue.
